Dewey Bridge's Last Moments

Photographs & Comments by MARCO LESHAWN SILVA

#1...The fire races upriver but Dewey is still intact.

#2...The flames have moved beyond Dewey but the bridge has not ignited.

#3...Dewey is alight. It only has minutes to live.

On April 6, 2008, Marco Leshawn Silva, from Grand Junction, had been four-wheeling with his family when they noticed a brush fire ignite along the Colorado River near Dewey Bridge. Strong winds pushed the flames upstream. According to Silva, "the volunteer fire department arrived just as the fire surrounded south entrance to Dewey Bridge. By then there were about 40 people watching the blaze. Local Law enforcement was on the scene for traffic control. The blaze wiped out visibility on the highway for about 10 minutes. The fire department chose not to attempt to save bridge...It is my belief the bridge could have been saved without casualties. No discredit to fire department. We appreciate their response. I volunteered with others to assist. Liability issues prevent communities from rising to an occasion that unites them even if briefly to overcome the unexpected."
